You Tube - Project Video - Hamilton, Ontario

Unequal Access to Healthy Food

Transcript: With the amount that OW [Ontario Works] gives you for basic necessities, it doesn't cover basic necessities at all.

The fact that you can't eat healthy is ultimately going to lead to illness ... period. I mean there's no two ways about it. People in poverty are sick ... a lot more than the general population.

The fact that you're spending so much time scavenging for food eats into the time that should be productively used to find a job or, you know, something that makes you feel better, better mentally and contributing something to society rather than falling deeper into the poverty pit.

Dim or brighter prospects for welfare reform?

Ted McMeekin is not a flashy man; he was, at one time, the minister of agriculture in Ontario. But he has a pretty good understanding of social issues, and he is a committed volunteer, and now he is the minister of community and social services.

It is in this latter capacity that he came to make some closing remarks at a recent conference on welfare reform, held in Oakville.

McMeekin took the podium to a smattering of polite applause, but before he had a chance to say how happy he was to be there, someone in the audience yelled at him: "Reject austerity."

Times Colonist - Victoria, BC - Letter to the editor

Food security should be a basic right

It's time for food banks to pump up the volume and start challenging the community to do something more significant than donating a few tins of canned fish whenever the shelves are bare. They should be joining with those voices who want to build a more inclusive community, one that will give all citizens access to affordable housing, nutritious food and appropriate medical care.

Building bigger, more efficient food banks may temporarily feed more hungry people, but they won't end hunger and they won't prevent the users of this system from feeling like second-class citizens in a first-class world.

This gives me hope - Cathryn Wellner's search for 1001 reasons to be optimistic

Freedom 90 dreams of closing food banks

Volunteers at food banks and meal programs earn their angel wings. They beat the bushes for funds, do a loaves-and-fishes routine with scarce resources, and keep hunger at bay for thousands.

And they get tired. Not of the work but of the grinding poverty that keeps so many showing up month after month and constantly sends new people through their doors. So volunteers in Ontario have formed a union. They call it the Freedom 90 Union "because we want to retire from volunteering at food banks or emergency meal programs - before we are 90 years old!"

United Way leads brainstorm session

If you are willing to take a leadership role to strengthen the social infrastructure in Newmarket, the United Way is there for support.

A group of residents, volunteers, organization representatives and politicians shared ideas at the Newmarket Community Centre and Lions Hall during the second meeting house hosted by United Way York Region.

The event built on the first meeting, in January 2012, which was at the Newmarket Public Library. More than 60 people gathered to talk about issues facing the community, including access to affordable housing, transportation barriers, education and employment.
